

Language properties of successful collaborative conversations

Alisa Wu

Columbia University

Melanie Brucks

Columbia University

Cite as:

Wu Alisa, Brucks Melanie (2022), Language properties of successful collaborative conversations.
Proceedings of the European Marketing Academy, 51st, (106376)

Paper from the 51st Annual EMAC Conference, Budapest, May 24-27, 2022

Language properties of successful collaborative conversations

Abstract

We examine why conversations boost individual idea generation. By analyzing text data from two real-time interaction studies, we find that the discussions that boost a consumer's creativity the most are with people who think most similarly to them. This is because similar others serve as "sounding boards" and clarify thinking.

Keywords: language similarity; idea generation; creativity

Track: Consumer Behaviour